

Précis

Scientists must learn a lot more information about the atmosphere that surrounds Mars before anyone attempts to go there. A rubble ball containing a radio transmitter could be dropped from a satellite. Scientists would be able to calculate the density of the atmosphere when the radio would signal the rate at which the ball was slowed down. Moreover, information about Mars could be obtained by dropping a capsule which contains scientific instruments on to the planet's surface.